TUESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1744.

Constantinople, November 30.

HERE have arrived, within these few Days, several Expresses from the Frontiers, with Confirmations of the raising the Siege of Mosul, and the Consequences of that fortunate Event. The Shah Nadir arriving with his Army before that City, sent an Officer to summon the Governor to surrender; to whom he gave this Answer. 'My Name is Houssein Carickchi, that is, Houssein the Emperor. Look ye, here there are two Pales, carry one to your Master; I consent that he empale me on it, if he takes me; but don't forget to tell him at the same time, That the Stick I keep, if he falls into my Hands, will prove his non plus ultra.' The Shah, extremely piqued at this, caused 12 several Batteries of Cannon, and four of Mortars, to be raised before the Town, from whence he thunder'd upon the Place for several Days. But as there was a Garrison of 20,000 Men in the City, commanded not only by the Bashaw Houssein, but by the Bashaw of Aleppo, who a little before the Siege had thrown himself into it with a large Body, the People were encouraged to do their Duty so well, that the Breaches were constantly repaired before they became practicable. The Shah, tired out with their Vigilance and Obstinacy, resolved, at last, to turn the Current of the Tygris, and then to attempt the Place by Scalade, the Besieged having no other Defence than a simple Wall. Having accordingly drained the River, he advanced with 1700 Ladders to the Assault; in which his numerous Army, tho' encouraged by his Presence and Example, was repulsed, with the Loss of between 5 or 6000 Men. He would, however, have led them back to the Charge, if the Troops, disgusted at the Hardships of the Siege, and absolutely discouraged by the last Repulse, had not repassed the River in spite of him. A Retreat made without Orders, could not fail of affording the Garrison a fair Opportunity of attacking the Rear of the Enemy; which they did with such Fury, as to put Numbers to the Sword. The Letters, however, carry Matters so far, as to assert the Garrison came up with the whole Persian Army, and destroyed it entirely, not so much as the Shah himself escaping; but this appears so very wonderful, and the Accounts we have by the Wry of Petersburg differs so much from this Constantinopolitan Relation, that we do not think it necessary to enter into further Particulars, till we have a satisfactory Confirmation of the Whole, which, supposing it to be true, we cannot be long without.

Rome, Decem. 28. The two Armies still occupy their Posts in the Ecclesiastical Territories; nor is there any great Appearance of their entering into Winter Quarters. The Austrians, on the contrary, have of late begun to act offensively; which have obliged the Spaniards to strengthen their Fortifications, and be continually upon their Guard. The Duke de Modena has resigned the Command of the Army to the Count de Gages, or rather parted with the Title of General, which was all he ever had the Opinion of the Count de Gages prevailing in every Council of War. There has been a Fire at Palermo, which reduced the fine Palace of the Marquis de Poli to Ashes. The great Constable Colonna having represented to the Pope, that the Privileges granted to his House by the Holy See, exempted him from the Payment of all Taxes whatsoever; his Holiness directed a special Congregation, composed of three Cardinals, to examine these Exemptions; who reported, that they were so extensive, and withal so precise, that, without Question, his Excellency's Estate could not be subjected to the Taxes lately imposed. The Success of this Opposition, encouraged the House of Conti to pretend to a like Exemption, in Virtue of a certain Charter granted them by the present Pope; but the Congregation to whom their Demand was referred, were clearly of Opinion, that it extended only to the ordinary Duties, not to new and extraordinary Ones, as those are which have been lately imposed; and this Decision is said to have come in good time, to bar other Claims of a like Nature.
